foothills of the Himalayas with Sherpa guides and all--- talk about Miss Rich Birch, plus a fasting sally down some bloody river whose name I just wont make the effort to pronounce. As Lynn Redgrave says in her commercials. THIS IS LIVING.

Anyway, when she turns up at my place I am shocked to see her attired in Paki dress, waist length tunic and tight around the ankles pants, plus a shawl over her head and kohl around her eyes.

Later on she put on a bhurka, the native dress that covers a women from head to toe and with no face showing. She has gone all bloody native. Picked up quite a bit of Parsi or Persian and is now going to the Oriental Studies group at the U of T to learn to read Parsi.

well, hope to hear from you soon.
Take care and the best to you and yours.

...I finally got home in Sunday night, but didn't call me until the following Wednesday and in such a bad temper I knew she had not off the wrong side of her head. However she said she was caused by the fact having spent 40 hours in the airplane back to the US of A. From Karambadi in Nepal the aircraft, (I have been there) from there to Riald from there to Frankfurt and from there to New York and from there to Austin. She came over an hour after she called and took me back to her home. Great by from the boys who had just come in from school. She had hundreds of snort she had taken. Must have spent all her spare time taking pictures. About 150 of them were taken in her operating room where she was shown repairing shattered hands and arms and feet and shoulders and heads and blood all over the bleeding place. One man had about five bullet holes through his left side. Christ knows how the poor soul lived. His spleen was gone, plus several ribs and inches of gut. But he LIVED.

My poor little children, three four and five with hands and fingers missing. Talk about man's inhumanity to man.

She also turned up with a full length chinchilla coat. Or what the merchant who sold it to her said was chinchilla. I suspect it has more than a tangential resemblance with rabbit. She went on a fifty mile hike to the
